
last 50 years and no apparent geographic or temporal clusters have been reported to date. However, several studies have provided evidence for an increased "risk" of developing a glioma in children or adults exposed to ionizing radiation during specific periods of the early life. The risk associated with diagnostic procedures using ionizing radiation, such as magnetic resonance imaging, remains unclear. Adult onset cases are rare and no specific familial predisposition has been identified. To date, the factors that predispose to glioma formation remain unknown, although the biology of these tumors (in terms of clonal evolution and tumor cell migration) seems to be different from other solid tumors. Recent studies have suggested that interleukin-6 (IL-6) could be associated with a poor outcome in glioma patients.

Therapeutic strategies such as immunotherapy could be considered in the future to limit tumor growth. Every mobile app has a data plan, and maybe it's even free. But if it comes at the expense of losing usage charges, you're fighting an uphill battle. That's not to say that all third-party data plans are equally good. Some plans like AT&T's GoData might be smart enough to figure out where you are and avoid buffering video, but there are some apps -- and yes, even games -- where a free data plan just means less data. Here are the top five apps where you might get much less than what you pay for. 1. Netflix, iOS + Android You knew this one was coming, didn't you? Everyone's favorite streaming video service is the poster child for apps that bring you less than you pay for. In fact, this is the app that first made the rules about how to use the cloud clear in the first place. 5ec8ef588b
