I just read your comment on my Create a workflow in Premiere Pro vs Photoshop review. I really appreciate this insight and it has helped me clarify my thoughts on that topic.

It was not meant to be the definitive piece, just an initial look at what I had to work with at the time. I would change exactly how I presented some of the workflow (and even techniques), so if anyone is interested in that I can do that for you.

I had intended to include the other software but realized readers didn't have access to it (probably because I didn't have a license to share).

I agree that this information does not need to be in the article. If that is something you wanted to do, I would be more than happy to do it for you.

Regards,

ps. I should mention, a lot has already changed since I finished the article, like a lot of other things in your industry, that might not have been in the article. If you found something that was hidden in there that was not made clear, I'm happy to add it to the article and talk about it. The new version of Photoshop has some features you may not want, and some that are really nice to have. The biggest boon is to professional photographers who need to take advantage of metering modes, exposure levels, and even Kelvin temperature. You will not find a more powerful database of camera keywords nor a more powerful catalog database. Both are massively useful — especially in retouching layers. A database of more than 100,000 color tags make your retouching job that much easier. The new version of Photoshop offers a new version of Adobe's Smart Sharpen feature that sharpens a single area by enhancing not just the edges, but the whole image. This is a big plus — because it's a tool that works much better when it can do the entire image, or as much as possible of the image. The new version of the application can also automatically straighten garbage and horizons so you can quickly get your images into final form. Finally, there's a new Develop module that adds filters and lets you chain filters together in creative ways. This feature is going to enable a whole new set of processing possibilities in image editing. Apple is also working on their own version of Photoshop, on a Mac, but right now it's really not that great.
