Q: What is the difference between web hosting that supplies a control panel and web hosting that doesn't? I want to be clear about what is the difference between web hosting that supplies a control panel and web hosting that doesn't. I can't find this in some references, and the articles that I found seem to be too general. A: A control panel is a pretty generic term. As long as it is some sort of interface to do things on your web server, it's a control panel. I've seen control panels that are all flash but are also available as JavaScript-based ones. The old and simple phpMyAdmin is a control panel. A control panel might have little more than an upload button and a file manager to upload files. The more advanced ones even have a built-in web server or management interface. Some web hosting providers like to advertise and market their control panels, but they aren't required to provide one. For example, if I'm hosting a web server at server123, I can offer to host a website at hello.world for you if you pay me for that. The hosting provider is not required to provide a web server, but the way they look at it is that there's a better way of doing things if they offer it. My hosting provider would much rather people use their control panel than mine. A: The difference: A control panel that gives you access to features that exist on the web server (or more precisely, that are part of the web server software. We're talking about things that the web server does for you like "add a web site to the server", not about things that you can do to the web server yourself such as "generate a password". The general idea is that the web server should work on its own and you shouldn't have to use anything except the web server software. By default most web servers don't have a control panel. A control panel that extends the functionality of the web server (hence the name "control"). Some examples of this are Ruby on Rails' application server (where you're not limited to a particular language and can use PHP, Java, Ruby, Perl, Ruby, Python, etc), the Windows® file manager. Control panels are a web developer's favorite toys. If you get your site up and running without a control panel, you're doing something wrong. They're like a TV remote and car ignition, you don't need them
