This happens every time. And I'm just as guilty. A friend demonstrated to me how effective it was. If you're struggling to catch up, don't be alarmed. Just sit back and watch the highlights. I found that I could sit back and catch up on my projects very quickly. More important than the speed is consistency. If you feed your printer your photos from your phone, you'll get a perfectly consistent print. But if you're using a laptop to print, your print will be inconsistent. In effect, you'll end up with a confused assortment of prints, for example, one with white borders and one that is hazy. The other pain-point I have with Lightroom is the lack of any time-saving shortcut. For example, you cannot really add image files to collections without having to become somewhat of a Lightroom savvy guru. If you try, you inevitably stumble across the dozen or so ways in which you can export the files directly, save yourself a bit of time and improve your practice a bit, too. (Of course, you can create your Collections and organize them inside Photoshop, but that's another issue for another day.) Ultimately, with Lightroom, it's not about having the automatic workflow and it's not about convenience, even though it's a very convenient tool. Instead, Lightroom is about having a proper tool that improves your practice and helps you take your photography to the next level. It should act like a teacher, not a slave. Ultimately, as always, my test is to see how well Lightroom works for me in terms of managing my photograph library. For me, sometimes it does that rather well and sometimes it doesn't. In either case, the test comes down to how helpful it actually is on a day-to-day basis. Like I said, Lightroom CS6 really struck a chord with me, offering a faster workflow that made making work more fun, not to mention easier. Lightroom CC delivers on virtually all fronts, only with one nagging bug. That should be noted down.
