“Rise from the ashes, Tarnished”. A new fantasy action RPG with a world that is divided into three lines – the Northern, Eastern, and Western Kingdoms – and with a quest where the present and the past intertwine. In this world, magic and science exist together. The Elden is the source of this magic, and this key to the unification of the three Kingdoms is the Diaspricong. After four years spent turning the dark continent into a light land, the Tarnished Kingdom was attacked by an unknown enemy. But as the Hundred War continued, a conflict emerged between the Elden and the fallen kingdom. In the midst of this turmoil, a new hero stepped forward. At the request of the King, this hero mustered the remnants of the Elden Kingdom and crossed into the Land Between, the City of Carranda, to rally the people. This is the War of the Ring, the beginning of the legend of the Lord of the Elden. We have decided to officially announce the brand-new FANTASY ACTION RPG, LORDS OF THE ELDEN, the upcoming mobile game of Idea Factory. Read on for the latest

When I try to spread object parameter to object literal, it doesn't seem to work. let twoDObj = { a: { x: { y: 'test' } }, b: { x: { y: 'test' } } }; let twoDMain = {...twoDObj }; twoDMain.a.x.y = 'test2'; It only works when I explicitly define let twoDObj = { a: { x: { y: 'test' }, z: { y: 'test2' } }, b: { x: { y: 'test' } } }; I know this is because it's bad practice, but I am wondering why it happens so, any explanation would be helpful. Thanks. A:

An object spread is basically replacing the object with a (shallow) copy of its own keys. You've defined two objects, with different keys, so you just copied the keys object. To get spread to work on objects that have different keys, you need to change the object to a Map.
