Cats and dogs can suffer from similar clinical syndromes due to systemic infection with a wide range of pathogenic microorganisms. The presence of sepsis can alter other organ systems, resulting in a syndrome referred to as the canine or feline sepsis syndrome. In contrast to feline sepsis syndrome, where cats most commonly suffer from a systemic infection with a single bacterial species, in dogs most frequently the underlying cause of sepsis is polymicrobial infection. The most common agents involved in polymicrobial sepsis include Salmonella spp., Escherichia coli and Staphylococcus spp. Serovars of S. enterica and E. coli are the most common isolates of sepsis. In dogs and cats, clinical signs of sepsis can present acutely and progress rapidly to a highly fatal systemic inflammatory response syndrome. Because dogs and cats are kept as household pets and can often live in close contact with other domestic animals, they can suffer from a systemic infection, with or without exogenous stress, with many similar clinical signs and pathogenicity. This article reviews the pathophysiology, clinical signs and prognosis of sepsis in dogs and cats. FILED NOT FOR PUBLICATION JUL 12 2011 77a5ca646e
