The On-Line Bilingual (Lang) test is a new method for the evaluation of the lexical-semantic knowledge of bilinguals. The Lang test can be administered either in a spoken or written condition. It is a special adaptation of the conventional Monterey test. The oral and written versions of the test are each made up of three experiments. The first part tests language comprehension (explicit knowledge), the second part measures the amount of vocabulary available (vocabulary) and the third experiment measures the test-taker's general cognitive ability. The performance of 13 non-native bilinguals was compared on the Lang test in a spoken and written condition. Effects of reading rate, vocabulary and IQ on the Lang test performance were examined. The results show that the oral Lang test is more suited for measuring reading and vocabulary skills than the written Lang test. They also show that intelligibility and vocabulary are more important for language comprehension than expressive speech rate.July 18, 2015 While all of a sudden, jaywalking appears to be a serious crime and the city's Department of Transportation is taking immediate and highly aggressive action, don't make the mistake of thinking that both cars and pedestrians are equally in danger. In fact, the growing number of jaywalking fatalities can be directly attributed to motorists and their careless driving. Officer Michael Ewing, a police spokesperson for the New York City Police Department (NYPD), confirmed that jaywalking homicides are down significantly. According to Ewing, fatalities have decreased by 87 percent in the past ten years. However, the NYPD is still dealing with an average of 27 fatalities a year in 2012. Ewing went on to describe the issue: "When the speed of a motor
