First let's get really clear on this. This is not a call to stop using temporary workers. The real issue is not to work for just one employer. Secondly, this is not an endorsement of ever having more temporary workers. The problem is that the outsourced jobs of today have often been created by temporary workers. The temporary worker became the new worker. The problem is the desperate need of many employers to displace full-time workers and offer cut rate or cheap labor that can only be characterized as modern-day indentured servitude. Historically the situation has been much worse, with millions of European women and men spending up to a decade in "slave like" situations, working for a pittance and then, when they've paid off their debt, being left to the mercy of the next unemployed person from the underdeveloped world. And in this environment, the weight of the new social contract has shifted to the temporary worker. He or she is the new worker in a newer kind of contract. Many are working long hours for little or no pay, and then they are shipped out when the job is done. Where does all this take us? It has taken us back to days when not even slaves were free to leave their masters, and had to be sold. We've taken it back to a time when the rent-a-slave was the kind of worker who only had to worry about protecting his or her job, and was not expected to be mindful of the pressures the employer might put on the temporary worker. Where does it end? We must come to a time when the temporary worker is a partner, a valued colleague, a resource to be respected, and expected to be treated with care. Where does it end? It must end with the end of never having to outsource an American job. We must close the economy wide gap between the earned income of full-time workers and the wage labor of part-timers. The current hourly wage of a full-time worker must become a standard for the minimum wage. Finally, we must reject the idea that a growing use of temporary workers signals a modern economic reformation. To the contrary, those who keep the temporary worker in their employment are perpetuating the horrors of industrial cruelty to them and the community as a whole. Most importantly, they are helping to keep intact and leverage the system that aids the rich at the expense of the poor. The system in which a majority of America's jobs are in the service industry and which tends to be more profitable when jobs are outsourced to an underdeveloped country. The system in which the poor are the ones who bear the worst of the downsizing and automation. The system in which capital flows to the top one percent of the population and leaves everyone else in debt. It's time to end all that!
