The specific goal of this study was to evaluate health care among 50-69-year-old postmenopausal women (n = 128) diagnosed with breast cancer and to establish if the incidence of adverse events differed from that of healthy age-matched female reference persons. Breast cancer patients in each of the five years following diagnosis had a higher risk of injury and serious illness and lower risk of infection than age-matched reference persons. Patients with a high physical workload had a higher incidence of injury and serious illness than those with a low physical workload. The number of medical visits and other medical treatments decreased with increasing age among breast cancer patients, but the reduction was less pronounced among reference persons. The risk of injury and serious illness were highest in the year following diagnosis, and decreased with time. Use of health care services increased with age among reference persons. We conclude that breast cancer patients are at risk of adverse events associated with hospitalizations, injury and illness.
