maker Vx Ace, keygen, crackÂ .Q: Understanding the output of this function

I have a function that returns a list of strings of a input function that doesn't return anything at all. The function is supposed to return a list of strings that are results of a mapping.
My problem is that I don't

---

understand the output of the function. My output on a certain line seems to work even though the input should not return anything. I suspect that it has to do with the print statement that appears as the first statement of the function. I suspect I am missing something subtle. Thank you for your help. import numpy as np def m(p): s = [] for x in p(np.zeros(10)): print x s.append(x) return s m([]) OUTPUT: A: I don't see why this code would work as you describe. If you want to see what happens, you can replace the print statement with print(x) and see what

---

happens. This will print the result of the expression passed to it, which is the result of the function call. You can also pass another name as a function parameter, and print that.

print(s)

Results in an empty list [] because the function didn't modify anything. I suggest you

---

simplify this to something like `print(x for x in p(np.zeros(10)))` " "The
