Shale oil and natural gas booms point to future energy needs Posted: Monday, March 4, 2014 12:00 am By John Flynn Each summer, the City of Stamford Convention & Visitors Bureau works with the North Carolina Council of Government's Economic Development Partnership on the Economic Conference on the Future of the Appalachian Region. The conference is held near Sylva, NC and generally attracts delegates from the entire Southeast area of the country to hear experts discuss the future of industry in Appalachia. Appalachia's natural gas, coal and oil reserves, though significant, pale in comparison to the estimated 1.6 quadrillion barrels of undiscovered oil. Sadly, many of those reserves are located in states like West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Kentucky. One of the most optimistic predictions for the future of Appalachian oil is that more than a hundred new wells are expected to be discovered this year alone. When Appalachian coal is found, it is usually extremely expensive because there is not enough water in the region to keep the coal dry enough for it to be mined on the surface. But, as shale oil and gas reserves are found in greater quantities in the mid-Atlantic region, there is a surge in demand for the heavier fuel. The amount of coal consumed in the region today is still 40 percent higher than it was in the 1950s. For a region that uses so much energy, it is easy to forget that there is more available. This year, an estimated 1.6 quadrillion barrels of undiscovered oil may be found in the mid-Atlantic region, according to the American Petroleum Institute, which is a significant increase from last year. There are over 5 trillion cubic feet of natural gas expected to be discovered in the region. Where did this energy come from in the first place? Much of it comes from the liquid deposits in sedimentary basins, which are present in most Appalachian counties. Most of those deposits are hydrocarbon-rich, with the majority being oil. As drilling technology improves, the region's oil deposits are expected to be found in deeper deposits as the wells are drilled down. In the Marcellus Shale, the process is called hydraulic fracturing. The process is done when a large amount of water is pumped into the rock, which fractures the shale. When the fractures are small, the gas can pass through the rock to the well bore. Large fractures allow the gas to flow to the surface. Drilling in
